Zoning Bylaw & Design SWOT Analysis

Strengths

- The zoning bylaw supports industrial land supply with flexible height limits up to eight storeys.
 Eliminating certain requirements, such as lot coverage, can attract industrial development.
 Clear conditions are included to define development requirements.

Weaknesses

- Restrictions on certain uses may limit mixed-use development.

 Indoor operation requirements may restrict the operational needs of industrial sites.

 Floor area requirements may exclude certain uses in new developments.

 Parking requirements in Part 7 could limit development potential due to site constraints.

Strengths

- Citywide visions clearly prioritize people-
- accessibility, and sustainability.
 Guideline is well-structured with sections on Citywide, Building Type, Neighbourhood, and Environmental
- Guidelines.

 Flexibility is emphasized across various design applications.

Weaknesses

- Lacks essential information, resulting in
- a broad yet vaguely-worded framework. Section 3.0 (Building Type) only focuses on mixed-use buildings, active frontages, and site design, offering limited guidance for innovative or industrial
- uses.
 Section 4.0 (Neighbourhood Specific) provides minimal direction, particularly regarding building heights and industrial

SWOT

Opportunities

- The zoning bylaw supports mixed-use developments, allowing businesses to benefit from nearby complementary uses. Allocating certain densities to specific uses allows for controlled yet flexible development.
 The broadness of certain uses provides emerging inclusities with an opportunity to develop within the zone.

Threats

- Future changes to other zones could create conflicts or limit uptake due to the restrict/weness of the zone.
 Market conditions or regulatory changes, such as new industrial environmental regulations, could pose challenges.
 Lower-density provisions may deter potential developers.

Opportunities

includes suggestions for building materials, cladding options, colour palettes, and designs for commercial frontages. These examples will be useful for material selection and aesthetic decisions.

Threats

- Limited focus on industrial uses, which are crucial for the zone's development.
 More tailored to commercial uses, neglecting the specific needs of industrial developments.
 The imbalance may hinder the ability to adapt the design framework, ultimately restricting the zone's potential for balanced and appropriate growth.
